Excerpt: ... 102 CHAPTER LXXXVII. The dowager margTavine of Bareith, widow of the margrave George-William, born princess of Saxe-Weissenfeld, and lastly countess Hoditz, had been beautiful as an angel, so people said. But she was so changed, that it was necessary to study her face in order to discover any trace of her charms. She was large and appeared to have had a fine form; she had killed several of her children, by producing abortions, in order to preserve that fine form ; her face was very long as well as her nose, which disfigured her much, having been frozen, which gave it a very disagreeable beet-root color; her eyes, accustomed to give the law, were large, well cut and brown, but so sunken, that their vivacity was much diminished; for want of natural eye-brows, she wore false ones, very thick, and black as ink ; her mouth, though large, was well shaped and quite pleasant; her teeth, white as ivory, were very regular; her complexion, though clear, was yellowish, leaden and wrinkled; she had good manners, but rather affected. She was the Lais of her age. She had never pleased but by her face, for as to wit, she had not the shadow of it. If you think that this portrait is drawn by a somewhat severe and cynical hand, do not blame me, dear reader. It is word for word from the own hand of a princess, celebrated for her misfortunes, her domestic virtues, her pride and her malice, the princess Wilhelmina of Prussia, sister of Frederickthe-Great, married to the hereditary prince of the margraviat of Bareith, the nephew of our countess Hoditz. She had indeed the most sarcastic tongue that royal blood has ever produced. But her portraits are, in general, drawn with the hand of a master, and it is
